Who's Mr. Marshall? Elizabeth and Jessica Wakefield are identical twins who sit side by side in their second-grade class. When their teacher is out with the flu, everyone changes seats, and the substitute teacher can't figure out who anyone is -- especially Jessica and Elizabeth!

That's when the new substitute teacher arrives. Mr. Marshall is very strict, and the class is on its best behavior. Then the twins see Mr. Marshall getting into a police car. Could he be a dangerous criminal? When the class finds out who he really is, they are in for a big surprise!

This was the first book I read in sweet valley kids series (many, many years ago) and afterward i couldn't get enough of them-these played a massive part in my childhood and really got me into reading (something, as a dyslexic child, I found hard) Would recommend this series to any little girl!

Siham says

I think is a beautiful book.

This was another Sweet Valley book that I read yesterday. I had nothing else to do and wanted to finish the Kids series that I own up. It was also another book that Jessica wasn't too bad in. I'd rather her be half on the good side than a complete brat that is just a turn off on reading a book when the child is total brat and obnoxious.

The Twins second grade teacher ends up catching the flu and she passes out in class. Elizabeth got the principal and Jessica woke her up with some strong perfume she found. The class ended up with two substitute teachers.

The first one Mr. Pinecone seemed nice, but he let the kids walk all over him. I thought it was just rude how they threw things at him. I think Elizabeth and Amy where the only two not being bad. Elizabeth tried to say she was herself, but Jessica wouldn't stop saying she was Elizabeth. (One the two times I didn't like Jessica in this book.)

The second substitute was Mr. Marshall and he was a mystery in a way. He didn't liet the kids walk all over him. He also knew all their tricks about switching seats and throwing things. He called them on it right away too.

Then on a Saturday the kids where playing at park with their parents and saw Mr. Marshall 'being arrested' they claimed. That was when the Mystery for them started. By the day he was to leave the rumor that he had escaped from Jail got back to him.

It turned out that Mr. Marshall was actually a cop who worked nights. He brought his partner into meet the class as well. I knew there was easy answer to it, but it was fun reading the kids ideas on who he was.

Another great read in the Kids series.

I liked this story. The first sub was Mr Pinecone, then this other man subs. I think he may have been a cop, which explains his strictness.

Amanda says

This book was about the twins and they did not know who their teacher was.

This book was kind of lame. Younger girls would love this most likley anyway. I don't remember it to well it's not a memberal book but I guess it's intertaning for the moment. That's all for now.

Fact: Did you know that a group of Chinese women learning English used Sweet Valley Kids books as a supplement to their textbooks and THEY LOVED THEM? True story.

Tara Calaby says

When their second grade teacher Mrs. Becker faints during class, Elizabeth, Jessica and their friends try to help her as only small children can: sending for the principal and reviving her with perfume in the place of smelling salts. Mrs. Becker is sent home to recover and the class gets excited at the prospect of a substitute teacher.

The next day, they arrive at school and plan all of the terrible ways they'll make life hell for their sub. He turns out to be a nervous looking man called Mr. Pinecone (no, really), who deals with paper wads and aeroplanes and children in the wrong seats just as well as his appearance suggested he might. Elizabeth feels a little guilty and Caroline Pearce tattles on the worst offenders, but the rest of the kids think it's a fantastic lark.

(view spoiler)

I found this one a little bitty, probably due to there being a lot squeezed into a very short book. I think it would've read more smoothly if poor Mr. Pinecone had been left out.
