Betty says

My mom read all three of these to me the first time. I've read them a couple of times since then. It's about a girl named Marianne. Who is very shy because her life has not been very comfortable. Her parents were killed in a tragic accident and her brother has been very odd since then. He sends her presents that she doesn't like. And one day a stranger comes into her life and helps her realize that her brother has been trying to kill her with magic. You would think that this leads to your typical story but somehow it transcends the normal realm of fantasy and ends up in the realm of truly weird. There is a laundry-mat where sofas end up in the washing machines and a library she can't escape where the books move. There is a game where when you roll the dice you are transported into the game and into the heads of the players. Beautifully written and very hard to get a hold of it is worth a read.

Karen Cleary says

I've loved the Marianne books since I first read them 30 years ago. They are one of my favourite comfort reads, if I'm sick and don't have the energy for something new. I hadn't read them for a while, and had forgotten lots of details, so it was rather like reading them for the first time, and I still love them all. Sheri Tepper was one of my favourite authors, these novels are totally unlike her science fiction, and I once read an interview with her where she said that she'd had her first book (The Revenants) rejected, so she wrote these in one quick burst and had them accepted, which led to the others being published. These could be categorised as urban fantasy, they involve magic and shadow worlds - there is a discussion at one point about alternate universes, but the context and characters make it believable. The characters are well-drawn and there are some very funny passages (e.g. the Chimera, & "Prince Charming").

Helén Sz?ke says

One of my favourite read again books by S Tepper, it's very hard to find now and very expensive too, so if you come across it, snap it up.

It's again a S Tepper strong female lead character who is trying to live her life but has a lot of hardships and obstacles to face. It delves into the realms of mysticism, magic and romance as Marianne a good person; encounters strange adventures in different worlds to survive against dark forces.

Highly Recommended
