I had so much fun reading this new Halloween picture book from Wendi Silvano, illustrated by Lee Harper.

The turkey in the barnyard wants candy when he sees the trick or treaters, wearing crazy costumes, getting candy from the farmers around the area. Turkey devises a crafty plan to get candy himself. The rest of the barnyard animals are in with him on this trick or treat adventure.

However, the farmers do not fall for his tricks so no treats. What are the animals to do?

Clever and witty and down right crafty fun from this duo. Published by Two Lions.

What's this? Yet another book with illustrations made with real watercolors on real watercolor paper?! How Old Skool!

Turkey and his silly looking barnyard buddies are envious of the candy the kids in costumes are getting this Halloween. Turkey tries dressing up in costumes, but in the midst of bad puns, is not able to fool the farmers in the neighborhood. "Halloween treats aren't for turkeys," he's told. Eventually he learns that just being himself works best and he shares his loot with his friends.

Cute.

Turkey and his barnyard friends are watching all the kids get candy just by going around in costume. They decide they should join in on the fun. However, Turkey needs to find the perfect costume to get some treats without being recognized.

Cute book

This book is full of cuteness. It is a fun read for kids. It would make a great read-aloud book. The illustrations are funny, colorful and whimsical. It has a great plot and moves along well with a nice solution at the end. Kids will really love this one. Highly recommended for Grades 1-4.

This author/illustrator combo never seems to disappoint. Wendi Silvano manages to interest both young and old with her humorous story of Turkey trying to disguise himself as a trick-or-treater. Lee Harper does an excellent job of bringing the characters to life with his fun, illustrations. Together the two create a book to enjoy over and over.

Kid Lit Reviews says

A pirate, a ghost, and a cupcake girl step up on your stoop. The pirate says . . . no, it's not a joke—it's Halloween! Kids are going from farmhouse to farmhouse, shouting, "Treat or Treat!" and collecting candy, as all the farmers take the treat. Turkey and his farm friends look on with awe. The people are simply giving the candy away. Turkey is especially jealous of the children. He wants some of that candy. He and the other animals love treats.

"Turkey is great at making costumes," crowed Rooster. "Maybe he can get candy for us!"

Just like kids this time of year, the farmyard animals are all yearning for Halloween candy but no one will give them any. All the animals look to Turkey for a solution because of his past successes with costumes. Using the human Trick or Treaters as their inspiration, the animals offer one suggestion after another to Turkey who tries them all. The illustrations come in great here because you can see that Turkey does his best to act the part as well as wear his cobbled together costumes. We see him leaping like a Swan-Lake-worthy dancer as he lands on the farmer's doorstep with a tutu of chrysanthemums, prima ballerina's aloof expression, and his candy basket out. Each time a member of the farmer's family refuses him with some pun like "ho-ho-no" to his pirate costume. But Turkey is crafty and finds a way, of course! A great book for school or library storytimes and sure to be a family favorite.

The girls and I have had fun with Turkey's other endeavors so I picked up the third book in the series.

It is Halloween and Turkey and the other animals notice that the costumed children are receiving candy. They like candy so they concoct a bunch of Halloween disguises to try to get candy from the other farmers.

Bethany says

Hahahahahahahahaha! A turkey who watches children trick or treat and wants in on the action grabs some farmyard friends which have some interesting costume ideas and low and behold--candy. I love it and so will kids!

Juliana Lee says

One crisp Halloween night, Turkey and his farmyard friends see how easy it is for the trick-or-treaters to get candy. But try as hard as they might, they can't seem to disguise Turkey well enough to trick the farmers into giving him candy. Then Turkey has a brilliant plan... he doesn't dress up at all and convinces the nearsighted Mable Mayberry that he has the best turkey costume she has ever seen! Turkey struts away with a bucket full of candy to share with his friends.

Turkey, made famous by Turkey Trouble, is back and this time his interest in costumes has found its ideal outlet, Halloween. In an effort to collect candy treats for his barnyard friends, Turkey dazzles with an abundance of costume creativity. Fans of Turkey's other stories will certainly love this one. It's a great addition to the library shelves. Well done.
